i have a question for you. what should a teacher do when a student in your childs class throws a fit? does it matter what the reaction is from the teacher? do you think the teachers should say anything at all? maybe even a kind word or encouragement? why or why not? hello and welcome back! as you recall from yesterday, i enjoyed sharing with you the paper horn art project that i recently completed with my 4th grade students. most of you have probably seen them online somewhere, and i thought i would share those pictures with you to give you some more background on what my students accomplished at the beginning of their kindergarten year. lets start with the most obvious of course: the faces of the paper horns! when my students and i first started planning the project, we went through four rounds of revisions and experimenting with the materials before we arrived at the final version i created for my students. the year is dwindling downsummer vacation is right around that proverbial corner. what do we do with our kids all summer fun fact: its a common misconception that the school calendar is based on a former agrarian economy in the united states. in agrarian areas school actually consisted of a short winter term and a short summer term, as farming needs increased in the spring and fall. in urban areas, the cities would become so hot that school would be suspended during summer months. eventually there was a push for a standard academic calendar across the country, and the school year was eventually established as the beginning of august on.. what part of learning do you enjoy? are you interested in learning math or science? do you enjoy reading? what do you like to do for fun? when you go out with your friends what are you interested in? what hobbies and interests would you like to learn more about? when you listen to music what kind of music do you like? why do you read? how do you spend your spare time? 5ec8ef588b
